

Area Sharing in the European Union's Countries

Mihaela PACESILA, Teaching Assistant

Abstract: The regionalisation is considered an important element of the integration in the European Union, facilitating the countries adjustment to the European realities and their preparation to better responding to the demands formulated by the Union. This process is always conditioned by the constraints which the political context exerts and it can be realised with the aid of the pre-existent institutions or by a new territorial division destined to better answer to the goals.